Some top Apple designer/developers, including Michael Bierut (a former Mac creator) and Joshua Cooper Ramo (of Time magazine) loved it so much they've created a new iPad case form, inspired by this "iPhone" project. The box is a blueprint for packaging a brand-new product, like a camcorder, for the first time. As far as lite blue cases go, this one is the best yet. The box is made of industrial foam that looks almost like liquid metal to me. Related to this "iPhone" product, is the fact that the Square company is opening up in an open-mode to getting many, many of its products created for/on the iPhone. They're even offering $100 vouchers on a regular basis in exchange for ideas. The Square company, of course, holds huge potential when it comes to how much money can be drawn from iPhone commerce. They're not the only company, though, that holds this potential. Screenshotted below are ones that I had to personally take in person at New York Retail Week this past month. That's the beginning of what the Apple company has been able to do at the retail level, using the iPhone as the platform. With only a portion of the iPhone available to the public, this element of Apple's retail success, as evidenced in these photos, is yet to be fully exploited. The Square company, meanwhile, is now in the process of developing a product line
