Discussion of the Related Art Electronic devices such as tablet computers, smart phones, and smart watches need to connect to the Internet with their users from various locations. These electronic devices may have small form factors and therefore may be easy to carry. A key component of these electronic devices are the displays. A display must be able to display a clear image. The display has a relatively small surface area that limits the size of the image. The resolution of a display image is the number of dots (pixels) in the image. The higher the resolution the better the clarity of the image. Some displays used for electronic devices are based on liquid crystal displays (LCDs). A liquid crystal display includes a substrate with a liquid crystal layer between two spaced-apart transparent substrates. The liquid crystal molecules in the liquid crystal layer are re-oriented by electric fields that are generated by the displays to vary the light that is transmitted through the liquid crystal layer. The liquid crystal display is not particularly good at generating high-resolution images, however, the liquid crystal displays are inexpensive and light. Therefore liquid crystal displays are used for many electronic devices. Other displays are based on active-matrix devices. Active-matrix displays generate images by sequentially lighting pixels, where each pixel is a small display element. The displays do not use a grid of transparent wires, like liquid crystal displays, instead each pixel is made of an individual transistor that is back-biased on the display. To generate a high resolution display, a large number of pixels must be activated. As the number of pixels is increased the power requirement of each pixel is increased. Active-matrix displays require a large number of transistors and thus a large number of semiconductor processes. The large number of semiconductor processes is a barrier to Starbucks, the international coffee chain, has a history of making a splash in Asia. In China, for instance, Starbucks' Shanghai location is almost as big as its Seattle store, selling over 1 million cups a day. And just in July, Starbucks launched its first standalone, standalone coffee shop in Shanghai, like a pizza place and a bar and grill combined. It's the first of hundreds of standalone Starbucks shops in China, the company says. "We're very proud of that, because that gives a really good insight into how we're growing," COO Troy Alstead tells New York Times reporter Kate Talerico in a recent interview (via Fortune). It also just continues that trend, she adds, of "seeing that we're truly ... a global business." Another highlight for the past year: Starbucks opened its first restaurant in Germany. "That was a huge win for the brand," says Alstead. But Starbucks is also making big moves on its own turf — specifically, the U.S., where it has opened four new stores in the past year. The stores, which have been well-received, rely on a new set of roasting techniques that use less oil, meaning the coffee is less likely to solidify in cold weather. The company is also overhauling its iced coffee recipe, replacing light cream with whole milk and softening the mix to prevent buttery aftertastes. In the era of the $150 coffee, though, there are a few things we don't expect a place like Starbucks to consider. But the company just did. The company's mobile app has been getting slower over time, and it found a solution: Upgraded the app's data streaming. Besides speedier loading, the app now offers widgets that can toggle the music and notification settings, for instance, along with the ability to add new email addresses or messages. Apple isn't widely known for its control over its own software, but the company is taking a bigger role in the
