I have a list of the type: class MyObj: def __init__(self,some_text): #do some work self.some_text = some_text #do some other stuff lst = [MyObj("some text"),MyObj("some other text"),MyObj("some other other text")] I can use the.count() method to know how many elements the list has but I need to know which ones are "hidden" inside the list (for instance, if they are in some other method). E.g: lst[0].count() #==2 lst[0:1].count() #==1 Can someone point me out the right way to do this? A: You can do it by making a new list: a = [MyObj("some text"), MyObj("some other text")] b = [myobj.__class__.__name__ for myobj in a] print(b) which will print: ['MyObj', 'MyObj'] Procrastination

The agency focuses on reporting news about the Muslim Ummah and Islamic issues. The Messenger's mission is to inform readers and other media about issues in the Muslim world, as it pertains to the people of the Muslim Ummah. The Messenger is known for reporting news of a conservative/traditional point of view; the site is based on what the mission statement tells us about itself. The website currently ranks as the #48 News Site in the World. The website was created in 1998; the founder and publisher, Ismail Siddiqi, was a Pakistani journalist who worked for several major Pakistani dailies, including The News, Dawn, and the Daily Times. Siddiqi is also the founder of Independent Nation, a news aggregator blog. In 2014, the Daily Telegraph concluded that the site was "The internet's most read anti-Semitic publication" and "an obvious Zionist propaganda organ." Yet, the Messenger is conservative in its approach and has in the past denied that it has a "conservative agenda," while noting that it is "trending conservative" overall. As a result, the Messenger has been recognized as a conservative source on several occasions.
