Adobe Photoshop Review When you create a catalog in Lightroom 5, instead of naming a catalog, you can create a custom album using any photo in the catalog. You can then assign the library to a specific location in the Finder or to the desktop, allowing you to easily access it at any time. And when you click the item, you will be shown the photos in addition to the details of the photos. Lightroom 5 now includes Smart Albums to allow you to choose all the folders that contain related photos in a single library. You can also use the tagging tool to add labels to your photos. As of Lightroom 5.2, you are free to choose one of the three tabs for the catalog window to display your images. There's the Grid view showing all your images in a grid format in white or black, the libraries view showing all your photos in a list with thumbnails of all the selected photos you were working on, and the details view showing an information panel for each image when you click on it. Lightroom 5.2 adds more options to the list of location types. You can now add a Geotag to fine-tune your location information, and you can move images between folders and the Geofence to associate an image with a specific location. If you work with a lot of video, Lightroom 5.2 enables you to choose whether to have the video timeline show only the active video or all the video you have in a library. Lightroom 5 comes with several new tools to help you manage your keywords and tags. There's the Insert Keywords tool so you can type in a new keyword and apply it to a group of selected photos. There's also the Tag Suggestions tool that displays all the photos with the same tag in a separate list, and you can select which tags are displayed in the search box. You can also edit the In-Camera metadata of images directly in the Media Browser and export it in a separate.psd format. And if you don't want to remember the location and file types of all your images, hit Export with In-Camera Settings Enabled to preserve the state and file types of your images after you've finished your workflow in Lightroom.
