The research on this topic which was carried out in 2007, concentrated on Singapore and it was concluded that there was no universal form for patient consenting. However, extensive literature has been published globally, internationally and in Singapore, on this issue. The objective of this review was to summarise the available information on patient information and consent forms for clinical trials in Singapore. A literature search was carried out in Medline and Embase covering the period between 1990 and 2007. A hand search for relevant articles from the Singapore Medical Journal was also carried out. A descriptive analysis was carried out to determine the factors for development of the forms. There was no universal form developed for patients in Singapore. However, there were three models described in the literature, which could be used in the two major forms used in Singapore. Three factors, the need for capacity to give consent, the need for protecting the patient's rights, and the need to provide the relevant information to the patient, influenced the development of the forms. The three models described in the literature can serve as a framework for the development of patient information and consent forms for clinical trials in Singapore.Israeli border police arrested a Palestinian in the central West Bank city of Hebron on Monday, a move that rights groups said was "unlikely to deter" violence.
