This is where I wish that this review was centric on Lightroom 5.0 instead of the previous version. In version 4, I was quite pleased with the changes to the interface and workflow and have recommended Lightroom 4 to many people for that reason. Unfortunately, that same interface has now gone completely under the hat for Lightroom 5, not only from a visual standpoint, but also from some functional ones as well. Not to be a hater, but I truly believe that this effort is much more a sign of Adobe's lack of care for Lightroom and its slow adoption rate than it is about offering a great new product. As soon as I laid eyes upon the Lightroom 5 user interface, I hated it. It felt unwieldy. Not as easy to use as the 1.7.x user interface. Not only that, but for the first time in my career, I would have liked to have seen more features that presented the photographer's view and not the view that Photoshop is accustomed to seeing. We all know Lightroom is one of the only products from the Adobe Creative Suite that is not an application from Photoshop. Rather, it is a product that should have been a plug-in. Lightroom is a flashy product, but Photoshop deserves that accreditation. Lightroom 5's interface is meant to emulate Photoshop. However, Photoshop is not only about bells and whistles. It is about getting the job done, and when a program shows more bells and whistles than it can provide functionality, it's time to start considering an alternative. For me, the biggest issue with the new interface is the removal of the image/video tool palette. One of the most-used features in Lightroom 4 is the ability to create custom tool palettes that can be accessed via menus. I can't see the need to replace this feature with a few sliders on a big dumb window. This is not even the first time that Adobe has removed this feature. I don't even know what we are left with in version 5.0.1.0, but it still doesn't even have the image/video tool palette. It's nowhere to be found.
