The evaluation of dental and skeletal maturation by the Eruption and Pathological condition and treatment phase (EAP) method. Eruption and Pathological condition and treatment (EAP) is a method for estimating the process of tooth eruption in young subjects. It was found that it is possible to assess the periodontal and skeletal maturation simultaneously from the results of an examination. Consequently, the method was accepted by the U.S. Public Health Service to be used as a means of evaluating the dental and skeletal maturation in public health surveys. The method involves the study of the dentition, i.e. the eruption and space between the teeth and the jaws, and the skeletal system, i.e. the formation of the permanent tooth germs and the growth of the bones, and is composed of three phases: the first phase deals with the dental eruption and the position of the permanent maxillary central incisors, the second phase describes the condylar development and the mandibular growth in relation to the molar and canine teeth and the third phase indicates the formation of the permanent premolars and molars. The erupting period of the permanent teeth is measured from the date of the last visit of the patient who is growing until the third permanent molar is in its permanent position. The eruption sequence of the permanent teeth is summarized in tables. A method of evaluating both dental and skeletal growth of the jaws and teeth is proposed. Home repairs began in earnest today as the volume of work to be done during the next few months on the house at the former Parnell Estate on the Upper Beecham is detailed. Throughout the year and into next year, repairs to the Grade II* listed house which was the residence of the Parnells from the mid-17th century will be carried out.
