If you use a tool like Band-in-a-Box or Pure-Data, you should've got a rough idea of how songs flow together. The first part of crafting is figuring out the backbone to your song, the chords/riffs, arpeggios, melodies, etc. in your head. Once you know where you're going, you can't go wrong, and it's here where the creativity comes in. Once you have your main track, you're going to have to add drums. Drummers may have their own software to make their beats, or they may use a program like Reason. If you have a click track, you're going to want to play along with this. It helps you focus more on your timing. Even if you're good at time, I recommend practicing with a click track to see how it works for you. You'll have to add bass in here, if you're going to need it. It's sort of a formality, but it is important. Once you have your main track and basic drums, you're going to need to add effects. Like you said, there are a ton of synth programs out there. You can go for a fully featured synth like Massive, or you can use a web-based editor like Reaktor. This is going to be more for experimenting with, so I highly recommend getting a VST. Once you have all of your effects, you're going to need to see what works. There's a lot of trial and error when it comes to this, so you might as well be familiar with the programs you're using. There's all sorts of cool stuff out there, it's just a matter of finding them. Once you have all of the effects you want, it's time to see what sounds good. As you already said, this is where the fun comes in. Just experimenting with a loop and effects can be a fun, but once you have a good foundation of it, you can start to make it your own. The main thing here is to make sure that your sounds are all good. Also, make sure that you have a good form in what you're doing. Once you start making a song that sounds good, it's going to need to be recorded. It's important to focus on quality. One of the main things that make quality records is being able to get the best recordings of your sounds. There are a lot of different ways to get it, but the good news is
